Summary:

Workforce migration is a complex and ambiguous phenomenon that requires detailed study of the contemporary trends in the development of the world economy. This social process is closely related to the placement of workforce, the change of economic structure, as well as to higher levels of social and labour mobility.

People come to another country to find temporary or better paying jobs. The recent intensification of migration is observed both in qualitative and quantitative indicators: the forms and direction of labour flows movement are changing.

The most important task now, is to solve this particular problem because the migration policy is a main factor of the socio-economic and demographic situation in the country now and in the nearest decade.
