Results of the research:
In the first chapter of graduate study, we examined the theoretical foundations of the concept of "tourism program" and analyzed the main elements of its formation. The result revealed the principles of segmentation of tourism product consumers to identify the specificity of localization of the tourist regions of the world programs.

In the second chapter we assessed the tourism opportunities in Brazil for the formation of differentiated tourist programs and developed a program of informative tour in Brazil with exactly the same objects and activities for visiting tourists. However, a program is designed for VIP travelers with high material prosperity, and the other economy class more than the budget. Completely new in this project is that these programs tours are quite similar in content and sites visited, but their value is significantly different among themselves.

Their main value is that they are equally caters to the needs and motivations of tourists on the same tour program, regardless of the material segment of consumers.

Recommendations:

Based on the analysis, we can see that the tourist programs in the world, mainly differentiated by popularity thematic areas, age and economic segments of consumers. However, more rarely differentiate identical tourist programs on the basis of any segment.

In this way, it must be concluded that well-composed differentiated programs allow tourists, regardless of their financial means, go to the identical educational tours and get a lot of unforgettable emotions. In our opinion, these programs are necessary and important for the tourist business.
